Ecoregions of North Dakota and South Dakota

The ecoregions are a classification system used to group and organize ecological regions and biodiversity. They are used to study and manage ecosystems effectively. The ecoregions are defined by the unique combinations of climate, geology, vegetation, and wildlife. The ecoregions are important for understanding the distribution of species and the processes that maintain biodiversity. The ecoregions are also used to identify areas of concern for conservation and management.